

Text 5

The human body automatically regulates the proportion of sugar in blood (diabetes). But, this self-regulation is sometimes out of order, for instead of being normal, the proportion of sugar in blood increases an hour after having the meal. This means that sugar is not absorbed. Thus, instead of functioning as nourishment, it remains in the blood circulation and becomes poison. This case is called Diabetes Mellitus.